

BOTH MISTAKEN.
Light Words Which Weakened the Happiness of Two Lives.

A cool breeze blew in from the river. It played among the reeds and tall grasses on the bank and ran lightly up the slope toward the white mansion on the hillside, dueling the vines that fringed the wide piazza where a group of young girls sat chatting, resting, or buying themselves with dainty needlework.

"What a delicious breeze!" exclaimed Florence Freeman, rising as she spoke. The slender, thoughtful-looking young man reclining unseen in the depths of a large easy chair just within one of the long windows glanced up from the pages of a book in which he had been absorbed, and his dark eyes followed her graceful figure admiringly.

"It sets me wild to be doing something," she continued, pacing up and down the piazza. "Do you know, girls?" she asked abruptly. "We're a set of slaves?"

"O, Florry!" exclaimed a laughing voice. "How don't you give us a lecture on woman's rights?"

"Never fear, that isn't what I was thinking of. We are hindered by circumstances from being and doing what we feel is within us to be and do."

"Listen, Florry," interrupted another voice. "Girls" is on her high horse. Now we shall see some prancing."

"Laugh away," returned Florence. "I'm in earnest. Why must we, because we happen to be drifted into a certain channel, or because a particular course is marked out for us by friends, drift on down the stream or keep on in the same course to the bitter end, even though we must smother the best there is in our natures in doing so?"

Intense feeling emphasized her words, and her unseen listener found himself wondering what personal experience had prompted them. Amy Gray lifted her eyes.

"It is often unpleasant," she said, "but it is best, after all, to have a settled plan and purpose and cling to them through everything. Think what a chaos would result if we all followed our own inclinations, and, worse than that, whatever a light for the moment be their ruling passion."

Florence did not answer for a moment; her eyes were roving across the wide sweep of the river, where a white sail glimmered in the afternoon sunshine.

"O, yes; there must be plans, of course, and they must be carried out, or nothing would be accomplished. But take special cases. There is cousin Dora, for instance. Why must she give up her painting to marry Fred Long, merely because she promised to when a mere child and didn't know what she wanted? Of course I don't say anything against Fred. He is good as gold, but he can't appreciate her talents. Why, he has begun to interfere with her plans already. Says she works too steadily, and wants her to give up some work she had undertaken in order to be married sooner. She only laughed over it. Of course she wouldn't say anything, but we can all see she doesn't love him. How can she, when by no sympathy with her on that subject? Now, why can't she say so, and be free?"

"She feels her responsibility," said Amy's soft voice. "She knows how devoted Mr. Long is to her."

"She'll here she comes," whispered Edith Stanley as a bright-faced girl fluttered up from the garden, like a dainty white butterfly, and perched herself on the steps. A dead silence fell on the group for a moment, and then Dora turned her laughing face toward her cousin. "Go on, Florry. You were giving a lecture, weren't you? I could hear you orating, but couldn't catch a word of the discourse."

"It ended now," said Florence, coolly, mentally resolving never to be so careless again in mentioning "special cases." "And unless some one has taken notes you can never hope to know anything about it, for it was quite impromptu." And, taking her cousin's arm, she marched her up and down the piazza humming a gay air.

Meanwhile, within the windows the young man sat motionless, his finger still between the pages that a few moments ago he had held so dearly, although his world had fallen in ruin around him since Florence began her "lecture." Outside the breeze ran along the tree-tops and ruffled the shining loom of the river. The August sunshine lay mellow on the grass, but he heard nothing, saw nothing.

The tea bell rang suddenly and startled him out of his meditations. The girl disappeared with much chatter and gay laughter, and he rose mechanically and walked like one in a dream down through the garden and on into a little grove beyond, his one thought to be alone where no human eye could add to his torment with its questioning glance. There, under the trees, where he and Dora played in childhood, he walked to and fro, one sentence ringing in his ears like a sentence of doom: "We can all see she doesn't love him." It was hard to come down from the pinnacle where he had imagined himself crowned king of one heart.

When Dora, only fifteen had given him her hand so confidently as they walked together in this very grove—only it was morning then, and spring-time, and the air was filled with the scent of wild crab apple blossoms, and she wore them at her throat like a plain, he could see her now, all in white, and the pink of her cheek as like the dainty blossoms—he had taken the gift unquestioningly, and no doubts had ever
